

Napwerte / Ewaninga Rock Carvings Conservation Reserve

Fact Sheet

This small, six hectare Reserve protects rock engravings (petroglyphs) which are a valuable link to the activities of early Arrernte Aboriginal people. Here outcrops of sandstone beside a small claypan form natural galleries for petroglyphs featuring a great variety of symbols or motifs. Much of the meaning of the petroglyphs, according to senior Arrernte custodians, is sacred and too dangerous to reveal to people not initiated into Aboriginal law.

It is easy to imagine the small claypan as a natural bowl, trapping and holding scarce rains and making this a favourite site for longer stays by Aboriginal people. For a while after rain, there would be ample water, game animals and time to patiently peck a record of their important beliefs into the sandstone. It is not known exactly how old the petroglyphs are.

Arrernte custodians are happy for people to visit the site but ask that they don't climb over the rocks, touch or interfere with the petroglyphs in any way. Any interference can attract heavy fines. The Aboriginal custodians ask that Arrernte women do not enter this site.

Access

Napwerte / Ewaninga Rock Carvings Conservation Reserve is 35 kms south of Alice Springs on the Maryvale Road (see map overleaf). The road is sealed for the first 10 km and is generally suitable for conventional 2WD vehicles, however it can become impassable after rain.

When to visit

The Reserve is generally accessible all year round. The cooler months (April to September) are the most pleasant times of the year to visit.

The petroglyphs are best viewed in early morning and late afternoon, when shadow effects make the shallow engravings more obvious. These times of the day also offer the best conditions for walking during the warmer months.
